

How many fiber optic cables are there in China Unicom

AI Overview

China Unicom operates an extensive fiber optic network, including over 20 terrestrial border cables, more than 60 submarine cable systems, and 10 global submarine landing stations. Terrestrial Fiber Network China Unicom has a vast domestic fiber optic infrastructure that spans all 31 provinces in China, supporting both broadband and 5G connectivity. In 2024, the company participated in a centralized procurement project totaling 65.7859 million core kilometers of optical cable, reflecting the scale of its ongoing network expansion. This network includes numerous terrestrial fiber optic cables connecting cities, counties, and industrial hubs across China. Submarine and International Cables China Unicom is also heavily involved in international connectivity. The company operates over 20 terrestrial optical fiber border stations linking China with more than 10 neighboring countries and regions. Additionally, it is associated with more than 60 submarine cable systems and maintains 10 global submarine cable landing stations, which facilitate international data transmission. Notable projects include the SEA-H2X submarine cable connecting Hong Kong, Hainan, the Philippines, Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, Vietnam, Cambodia, and Indonesia, as well as plans for a nearly 3,000-kilometer cable from Hong Kong to Cambodia. Network Scale and Coverage China Unicom's fiber optic network is designed to provide comprehensive coverage for both domestic and international communications. The company's infrastructure supports high-speed broadband, cloud services, and digital applications, forming a critical part of China's digital economy and global connectivity strategy. The combination of terrestrial and submarine cables ensures robust data transmission capacity and redundancy for international and domestic traffic. In summary, while the exact number of individual fiber optic c...
